Excerpt from Agricultural Research in New Hampshire: Annual Report of the Director of the New Hampshire Agricultural Experiment Station for 1940 Down through the ages, since evolution through chance or di rection had sufficiently differentiated one animal from another so that man had somewhere, somehow made himself known, there was doubtless an ebb and ow of food and famine, - sometimes an im provement as a result of mans new techniques, and just as often a reversal due to the vicissitudes of nature. Man became proficient early in subduing or eluding his enemies. He found or fashioned other shelter as soon as he could exist without the protection of a cave. Thereupon he could hunt for animals, roots, and natural fruits more widely. He domesticated animals to his use and found pasture for their sustenance. Much later he corralled his animals, housed them against inclement weather, planted crops, and did less wander ing. Then, he had the experience of learning that other animals, as well as man, competed with him for food and that he must reliu quish his appetite for animal esh and animal products in favor of nourishing his family with vegetation. He was often, indeed usually, hungry; too hungry to thrive. The competition was keen. Human itys upward climb for prestige in numbers within the clan or the kingdom or the region was slow and uncertain. Disaster stalked ever at his elbow in devastating, unpredictable diseases often born in weakness of body resulting from too many mouths to feed from poor harvests. Within the span of history, mans only source of increasing food supplies seemed to lie in discovery of new countries and colonization. With the occupation of America and the...
