Not illustrated. 1849 Excerpt: . . . for any time; and that, if they had been taken upon their estates, the Oude Government would have attempted to confiscate them, on the ground that they had given shelter to them. One of Captain Barlows detachments had succeeded in arresting Maharaj, the nephew of the deceased leader Bukshee, and two followers; but the landholders assembled in a body and rescued them. This enterprize failed, because the plan was too complicated for the scene of operations, and the strength of the force. Each detachment was too small to act by itself against the formidable band they had to attack; and the difficulty of communicating with each other from such distant points, over such a forest, was too great, to insure united action when occasion required. Had they gone together, and as fast as they could, to the point indicated, they might possibly have come upon the...
