Excerpt from Ancient Proverbs and Maxims From Burmese Sources: Or, the Niti Literature of Burma The Sanskrit-Pli word Nti is equivalent to conduct in its abstract, and guide in its concrete signification. As applied to books, it is a general term for a treatise which includes maxims, pithy sayings, and didactic stories, intended as a guide to such matters of everyday life as form the character of an individual and influence him in his relations to his fellow-men. Treatises of this kind have been popular in all ages, and have served as a most effective medium of instruction. In India a very comprehensive literature sprang up, known as the Ntisstras, embracing what is called Beast-fable lore, represented by the Pacatantra, and its epitome the Hitopadesa of Vishnusarman, and the numerous ethico-didactic anthologies which, based chiefly on the Mahbhrata and other ancient poems, gained popularity by the collected apophthegms of Bhartrihari and Cnakya. Anthological study at length became so inviting, that in the Srgadharapaddhati, a compilation of the fourteenth century A. D. , we find about 6000 stanzas, gathered from more than 250 sources. The Buddhist Jtakam, containing 550 stories, is a rich storehouse of fables, and, though in character similar to the Pancatantra, is not classed as a Nti, nor does the Dhammapada, and other treatises of the same kind, full of maxims of morality and religious reflections, come under the designation.
