Excerpt from Roads in Landscape Modeling: A Case Study of a Road Data Layer and Use in the Interior Northwest Landscape Analysis System That said, an important issue is how to appropriately depict roads in a land scape to accurately assess these tradeoffs. As tangible features in the landscape, roads can be considered as a current condition, much as a plant community or current vegetation structure can be modeled as a persistent fixed feature or state variable. However, roads also serve as disturbance agents and vectors, and thus are part of dynamic ecological processes. In some instances, roads may cause distur bance soil erosion or habitat fragmentation) or facilitate disturbance act as conduits for spread of weeds and other disturbance agents); in other instances, they may inhibit disturbance creating a fuel break that stops progression of a fire). However, including roads in landscape-level analyses presents many chal lenges owing to a frequent lack of adequate attribute and effects data describing types of roads and their impacts, as well as a lack of accepted modeling method ology.
