Excerpt from The Presbyterian and Reformed Review: October, 1891 But this alleged presumption will be totally nullified if it be shown from Scripture that there is any class of sinful beings for whose restoration God has made no provision. For, evidently, if this be revealed in the case of any, then it is certain, whether we can understand the mystery or not, that the eternal ruin of some creatures must be somehow reconcilable with the infinite moral perfection of God, and the force of the asserted presumption is broken, since it demands nothing less than a restoration which shall be absolutely universal. Now, as a matter of fact, the Scriptures do teach, formally and explicitly, that for a whole class of sinful beings God has made no provision for salvation. Basal to the revelation of the Word on this point are two propositions. First, that there is no forgiveness of sin without the atoning sacrifice of the Son of God; of an atonement made by the sinful person himself, the Scriptures know nothing. Secondly, it is also clearly taught that such atonement must be made by One suffering in the nature of those for whose sin the atonement is made. As for the first of these propositions, it is formally taught in Heb. ix. 22, that the principle of the Mosaic law, that apart from shedding of blood there is no remission of sin, applies in full force to the defilement by sin of those heavenly things of which the earthly were the patterns. So also Paul declares (gal. lii. That if there had been a law given which could make alive, verily righteousness would have been of the law, and further...
