Yes, I loved her so well, that I was seized with horror at my past life! I resolved to repent, to marry her, and settle down into an honest man. Accordingly, I summoned my messmates, told them my resolution, resigned my command, and persuaded them to depart. They were good fellows; engaged with a Dutchman, against whom I heard afterwards they made a successful mutiny, but I never saw them more. I had two thousand crowns still left; with this sum I obtained the consent of the silk-mercier, and it was agreed that I should become a partner in the firm. I need not say that no one suspected that I had been so great a man, and I passed for a Neapolitan goldsmiths son instead of a cardinals. I was very happy then, signor, very, --I could not have harmed a fly! Had I married Clara, I had been as gentle a mercer as ever handled a measure. The bravo paused a moment, and it was easy to see that he felt more than his words and tone betokened. Well, well, we must not look back at the past too earnestly; the sunlight upon it makes ones eyes water. The day was fixed for our wedding; it approached. On the evening before the appointed day, Clara, her mother, her little sister, and myself were walking by the port, and as we looked on the sea I was telling them old...
