Penn upon our shores, the scene conjured up by the blended spells of memory and imagination, for the mirror of each reflects the other until the images of both are indistinguishably mingled, is one not only of picturesque but philosophic interest. We see the good ship Welcome moored within the shadow cast by the lofty pines upon the clear waters of the vast, the silent and solitary Delaware. A boat, urged by eager and sinewy arras, seeks the shore; and its voyagers regard, with an admiration akin to awe, the spectacle before them. Nature, in her own still, unstartled solitude, is ever sublime. The grand old forest, stretching to the Pacific and embosoming the homes of future empires, rose darkly against the bright, autumnal sky, towards which the smoke of distant Indian fires, curling above the pine tops, slowly ascended. But, even then, the dominion of the primeval forest had been disputed; and the low-roofed cottages of the blue-eyed Swedes dotted the clearing. Upon the shore, were gathered those sons of the north, sturdy and stalwart, their bronzed cheeks glowing with joy, and their hardy hands upraised in welcome; and beside them, the gentle but heroic partners of their woodland life, awaiting, with weeping delight, the strangers who, though not of their country or kindred, had still been wafted hither by the gales that swept from the father land and whispered of home. Near them, were groups of...
