Excerpt from Foreign Agriculture, Vol. 3: A Review of Foreign Farm Policy, Production, and Trade; May, 1939 After 1933, an expanding Germany was in urgent need of southeastern Europe's agricultural products and raw materials, while the countries constituting that region welcomed the Opportunity to dispose of their surpluses at a time when world trade had risen only slightly and there was little chance of significantly increasing trade with other countries. And since bilateral trading by that time had been developed into a practical method of foreign trade (notwithstanding the serious limitations involved), German goods were gladly accepted in exchange for agricultural and other raw - material surpluses. Nevertheless there were hitches, disputes, and temporary difficulties attending this trade conducted largely on a barter (compensation) basis. Germany drove hard bargains with the countries of southeastern Europe, forced goods upon them that they did not need, or had large clearing balances piled up in their favor, thus virtually borrowing funds from the poorer countries to the southeast. Since the farmers in these countries had to be paid for their hogs, wheat, and corn,...
