Brand New Book  Print on Demand .He imagined the silver visages dissolving in the light of an unbroken dawn. A splendid ethereal sight suddenly adorned the scene of bloodshed. The god of light appeared, swift and soundless. The Spartan king whispered a breath of longing under the sea of dispersing blades. Apollo moved silently through the dark mass of the Immortals, aiming his bright arrow at one Persian royal guard after another. The shining arrows penetrated the blackness. Leonidas felt the rippling roar of bloodied bodies, and he hardened his limbs against the large churning wave of shields and armors. His unspoken words remained unutterably whole for they traversed the blissful silence created by the unexpected divine presence. Apollo shot one arrow after another. But Leonidas knew that the time for glorious self-sacrifice had come. No one could delay the inevitable. The Spartan king shouted a battle cry that faded in the deafening clash of blades. Then he glimpsed a fiery rose twirling before a vast darkness. He nearly felt as though the ghostly limbs of fallen warriors were keeping him aloft as a sea of dead bodies began to consume his field of vision. The silver faces poured in, seemingly untrammelled as they advanced in deadly unison. Apollo was gone now. Leonidas felt the sacred springs flow beneath his feet. He felt the hot gates breathe all around him, reminding him that the death of instant defeat would precede his own death. He felt the mountain breathe fire, infusing his heart with the sublimely untouched radiance that has just departed from his vision. In that moment, he saw another warrior in his mind. He saw a man wearing a lion s head as he faced...
