The analysis of this phase of economics constitutes probably the most enduring contribution made by called classical writers. The literature of no other country contains any comparable contribution to the theory of international trade. The student who would secure command of the only sustained and consistent exposition that has ever been made must still turn chiefly to the British writers. Part II is on the controversy between free trade and protection and particularly on the arguments advanced pro and con. Beginning with Adam Smith, it proceeds to writers of other countries than Great Britain, and to schools of thought different from the British. Some of the strongest and most effective reasoning in favor of protection has come from Germans; and not only Germans of the mid-nineteenth-century period, like List, but of the modern school of German economists. Among these, Wagner and Brentano are well known; others, like Schller of Vienna, are much less known to English readers. A representative of the now dominant French attitude is found in Meline, whose report, here reprinted, was made in connection with the great overturn of French tariff policy that took place under his leadership in 1892. Part III deals with the protective controversy in the United States. Here also the selections, while largely from familiar sources, come in part from others not generally known. Hamiltons Report on Manufactures, of 1791, has probably been more frequently referred to than any public document which has appeared on this subject in the United States. Gallatins free-trade memorial of. 1831, on the other...
