Excerpt from Toward Democracy, or the Revival of an Old Idea: Direct Legislation the Next Step in Democracy Primitive man in the rudest stage of human existence, lived the solitary, individual life, without government of any form. He roamed about through forest and fen in search of food, defending himself from the wild animals, or from his equally savage brother man with such weapons as nature afforded him - the stick and the stone. This is not a fanciful picture. In the natives of Australia, we have in modern times an example of man, in a rude stage of existence, living without any form of government. As the centuries rolled by the people began to come together in communities. This gathering together we may say was the beginning of civilization. When this took place the need of government of some kind was felt. Thus we have the development of the communal or tribal systems of government. Under the tribal form of government we can imagine the people met together and passed such laws as they thought necessary for the well-being of the community. In modern times we have had examples of such primitive systems of government among various aboriginal peoples. Chiefs or head men were appointed to see to the carrying out of the laws. This was in effect pure democracy. This was rule by the people. It had this advantage over our modern system, namely; that the people had exactly such laws as they wanted, and they did not have any laws that they did not want.
