Excerpt from Practical Theology: A Neglected Field in Theological Education If the position taken in this discussion be correct, the problem created by the introduction of scientific method into our theological seminaries is to be solved, not by returning to the pre-scientific ideal of theological training, but by advancing to a more truly scientific treatment of the essence of Christianity. The real truth of our religion is to be found in life. This deepest truth cannot be set forth by exclusively historical methods. A psychological view-point is also necessary. The discipline of practical theology could represent this view-point, and would thus furnish a necessary element in the total scientific task of the theologian. As a great Christian scholar has said 3 The theologians of every country only half discharge their duties if they think it enough to treat of the Gospel in the recondite language of learning and bury it in scholarly folios. A practical theology of the nature indicated in this essay is per haps one of the most needed contributions to an adequate portrayal of the truth of Christianity.
