Excerpt from Medical Record, Vol. 71: A Weekly Journal of Medicine and Surgery; January 5, 1907-June 29, 1907 Case IX. - While the following appended case of pneumonia did not occur in the neighborhood of Messer, it may have some bearing upon the question of susceptibility of certain families in their relation to pneumonia. The patient was the son of the patient in Case VIII., the nephew of Cases No. IV. And VI., and a cousin of Case V. Or in other words, of this series of nine cases of pneumonia, four occurred in one family. This patient's aunt and cousin had died of pneumonia during this epidemic of grippé. The patient was a boy, aged three years, who lived with his father, twelve miles distant from Messer. The child had not been away from home. And had not been exposed to any case of croupous pneumonia. For a few days previous to March 29 he had suffered from a cough and cold. The patient lived in the same room with his father, who developed pneumonia on March 28. The patient developed croupous pneumonia on the following day, or one day later than the father. The lower lobe of the right lung was consolidated, and recovery occurred at the end of two or three weeks.
