Excerpt: . not been dealt with in the same clear and simple manner. To return to our subject, let me impress upon the surveyor the necessity of always laying out fences in such a manner as to avoid carrying any surface water away by underground means, and always to let this be his maxim-- All surface water to be carried away by furrows, ditches, and open watercourses. Pipes only to be used for underground drainage. When a surveyor is called upon to set out new fences to regulate matters of exchange, or to divide lands for purposes of sale or otherwise, let him always be wise enough, whenever such division comes between, arable and pasture land to have his ditch in the arable field. It is a difficult matter--in fact, I believe, without incurring great expense, it is impossible--when a ditch is in a pasture...
