Excerpt from Some Empirical Tests in Vocational Selection, Vol. 49 A. Tests for typists. Lahy (32), reports an experiment made with eleven typists as subjects; six women who had had from two to four years practice, and five men who had had from two to eight years practice, in typing. Measures of the following functions or processes were obtained; muscular sensibility of the two hands, speed of auditory reactions, memory for numbers and sentences, attention, and several higher processes such as imagination, abstraction, judgment and reasoning. In comparing the three good and the three mediocre women subjects it was found that the former possessed a finer threshold of tactile and muscular discrimination, a tendency of the hands to become equally strong, a better memory, fewer errors of attention, but showed longer auditory reaction times. In comparing the men subjects the same distinctions were found. This is an interesting and valuable contribution in that it stimulates work along these lines and blazes the trail, but it has not been worked out extensively enough to be practically applicable. Lough (35) reports graphical curves showing the relation between the time required to perform a letter substitution test, habit formation test, measured after repeated trials with the test, and ability in stenography and typewriting for a group of high school students. The curves show a good degree of correspondence between performances in the test and judgments of ability in stenography and typewriting. To quote Lought It is evident that if we give these pupils a test in habit formation first, we can determine what pupils are capable of doing good work in typewriting, and we can save some of the pupils a great amount of...
