Excerpt: . . . shining virtue repelled their power, and dimmed the glory of their arms. It was no evidence of commendable valor on the part of Andr this undertaking of a mission which he believed to be an easy task. Andr, who had known before her marriage the wife of General Arnold in Philadelphia--in which city, at the time, Andr was a leader in society--entered into correspondence with Arnold and was the agent through whom Arnold bargained, for the price of 6,000 and a commission in the British Army, not only to surrender West Point, but also to turn over to the enemy the person of Gen. Washington, of Gen. LaFayette and all other American Generals he could persuade to be his guests in the Robinson house, his quarters, on the night of September 26, when the British, it was arranged, would make the attack. Gen. Washington and other officers were to be surprised in the dead hour of night, while they slept. Following these important captures, the garrison of West Point was to be given up. Thus the end of the war was to be secured. The story here related tells in detail how Major Andr--said by one of his English enthusiastic friends to have been a valuable aid to the British General Clinton, by putting in motion the whole machine of war, --was outgeneraled and captured, on his return from Arnold, by three farmer boys of Westchester County, who refused his offered bribes.
