Regions South of the Equator.--Cretaceous beds occupy a large portion of Western Australia, stretching from the banks of the River Darling in long. 135 deg. E., towards the coast of the Gulf of Carpentaria on the Northern coast. In New Zealand, the Cretaceous system consists of a lower division of incoherent sandstones in which beds of bituminous coal occur on the west coast; these are surmounted by a mass of strata, from 2,000 to 5,000 feet thick, which appear to connect the Cretaceous with the Tertiary systems. The...
