My early childish impressions continue right along into our first summer in the country and that we were about ready to embark upon, I am glad to say. There was much stirring and bustling around getting the city house ready to close for the summer. The statues and furniture had to be wrapped in sheets, all the curtains taken down and windows boarded up. Melsom and I were bursting with joy to think we would soon be in the country free to run around outdoors. I do not remember too much about the trip itself except that we got up awfully early (that was because we were too excited to sleep) and...
