Excerpt from Analysis of Program Program Activities, National Institutes of Health, 1955: National Institute of Allergy and Infectious Diseases, National Institute of Dental Health In studies on basic immunology, increasing emphasis has been directed toward the characterization and purification of antigenic material. By applying the concept that protective antibodies should be present within or on the cell wall of an organism, it has been possible to obtain fractions which at least are morphologically pure and which have increased antigenicity and decreased toxicity. That this concept of surface antigens may be generally applicable appears to be substantiated by the fact that such immunizing products have now been obtained from a fungus and two genera of bacteria.
