Not illustrated. 1918 Excerpt: .show) does not lend itself to appraisal as an influence affecting the school progress of boys. Whether this activity, from a general standpoint, is a help or a hindrance to school progress depends upon several elements. If the quality of the pictures is wholesome, and if attendance is under sanitary conditions and not so frequent as to cause neglect of other more wholesome activities, it may be an asset for school progress by reason of the mental stimulus and the pleasurable tone which it affords; otherwise, it may be a source of serious interference. But the percentage scores of the tables for attendance upon shows and the theater show no apparent relation to advance in school. The scores for all three groups of boys are high; the accelerant boys lead, the retardants score in second place, and the normal boys have the lowest score. It may be that the tastes of the accelerant boy include a wider range of types of theatrical entertainment, and a corresponding attendance upon more kinds of performances; but in the absence of data as to the kind of shows and theaters the respective groups attend, the differences in score between the accelerant and the retardant groups can be said to signify nothing. The fact that the normally progressing boy scores lowest may indicate that among this group of boys--who show the greatest amount of participation in the normal out-of-door activities of boys, and likewise a type of mind most uniformly in...
