Forgotten Books, United States, 2015. Paperback. Condition: New. Language: English . Brand New Book  Print on Demand . Excerpt from The Locomotive, Vol. 24: Hartford, Conn., January, 1903 This will be welcome to engineers generally, not only because it is one more contribution to a subject about which too little is generally known, but also because the facts given in the Report, and the conclusions drawn from them, are presumably uninfluenced by any personal bias on the part of the experimenters. The primary object of the experiments carried out by the Bureau was to determine the fitness of oil fuel for naval use, and the conditions essential to its success in that service. This problem is different from that which confronts the land engineer who would use oil, and yet there are a sufficient number of fundamental difficulties common to both to make the present experiments valuable to all prospective users of oil. We therefore present, below, such of the general results and conclusions reached by the Bureau as appear likely to prove serviceable to readers of The Locomotive. In some passages we have followed the Report textually. One of the most serious items to be considered is the cost of the oil. This varies greatly in different parts of the country, and the engineer who contemplates the use of oil will have to take into consideration the situation of the proposed installation with respect to coal and oil fields, and the transportation facilities that he can command.
