Not illustrated. 1882 Excerpt: .appeals, then, to the lover of the beauty of nature, to the student of astronomy, physics, physiology, biology, and anthropology, to the searchers in every department of science, but chiefly it appeals to those who have banded themselves together for the observation of nature, and who delight in the brightness of skies and field, and in the beautiful life of birds and animals and flowers. The name and the work of the field naturalist have become increasingly popular within recent years. It is now nearly fifty years since Rennie published his Field Naturalists Magazine. The Manchester Field Naturalists Society, which was probably the first to adopt the title, has had many sister associations, and now there are numerous field clubs in various parts of the country. This journal, whilst officially unconnected with any particular society of Field Naturalists, will strive to be useful and helpful to them all. It will honestly endeavour to promote their welfare, and thus hopes to command their sympathy and support. Pope has said that the proper study of mankind is man, and the field naturalist who in the course of his rambles comes across some trace of the bygone culture of his forefathers in flint weapon or funeral mound, will certainly not be indifferent to the claims of archaeology. The prehistoric remains of our land can only be rightly estimated when, by the aid of ethnology, we examine the related phenomena of other countries. Viewed in this light even a fairy...
