He is able to trace the successive degradation of the radium atom through at least six diverse stages, each produced by a loss of a definite number of electrons, until at length, as he believes, it ends as an atom of lead--one of the commonest and least active of metals. This is very different from the alchemist's dream of the transmutation of lead into gold, but it is at least as epoch-making a discovery. On the whole, with low-grade ores and dilute solutions of potassium cyanide, the cyanide solution itself will, if properly aerated, carry oxygen enough to dissolve the gold; so that artificial oxidizers are seldom needed, unless there is some reducing agent present in the water or the ore which will...
