Excerpt from An Address Delivered on the Consecration of the Worcester Rural Cemetery, September 8, 1838 It has been the care of all ages of the world, and of all nations of men, to mark with tokens of affection and respect, the disposition of the remains of the dead. The funeral pile has been erected, that their ashes might be gathered to the sacred urn. The process of embalming has been applied to preserve the body from decay. The Sarcophagus and the Tomb have kept precious relics long in the remembrance of the bereaved. The Cenotaph, the monumental Column, and the broken Shaft point to the repose of Heroes, and Patriots, and public Benefactors, while the simple head-stone marks the spot, where unobtrusive merit and humble worth find a burial place. Garlands and flowers have strewed the Bier of Youth and Beauty and Innocence, and the Willow and the Cypress are the recognized emblems of the tenderness of wounded affection, and the fidelity of unsolaced grief; and where there was naught but the new raised earth to denote the place of interment, the tear of the Mourner has made fresh the sod of the Grave. Here, then, we pause, to ponder upon the purpose of our meeting together to contemplate the solemn stillness of the scene to summons to this now consecrated spot the hallowed associations of the living with the dead for here, in future, shall be traced the inevitable connexion of the one with the other. The mighty Rivers now not more certainly to the Ocean, than all, which are of time, are surely gathering to eternity. Where now, are the People and Nations, which dwelt, in ancient...
