We have not, however, been able to discover the least indication of his excesses being connected with regularly recurring depression. The patient s moral incapacity from childhood contrasts very sharply with his intellectual talents. But it is well known from every-day life that morality and intellect are to a great extent independent of each other. These cases are therefore generally designated as moral imbecility or moral feeble-mindedness. Such men are born criminals by nature, and are only distinguished from ordinary criminals by the great extent of their moral incapacity, by their having wills completely unaffected by the restraining experiences of life, and by their being fundamentally incorrigible. There is, therefore, as a rule, no other course to be taken, for their own sake, and for the sake of those around them, than to isolate them as being unfit for society, and as...
