The growing of abbages in a small way for the home and local markets by farmers and small truck growers is, of course, general, and probably occurs in every county of the state. In this case the cabbage is not the chief crop, and frequent rotation with other garden vegetables is practiced, so that as regards plant pathology this culture is not wide and early dissemination of diseases. Cabbages are grown in a more intensive way, however, in certain sections of the state. On the low, black lands along the shore of Lake Michigan, from Kenosha in the south to Green Bay in the north, winter cabbages are grown for storage purposes. This is the oldest branch of the industry in Wisconsin, and that in which this state excels. For twenty years the farmers near Racine have been growing cabbages on a large scale, storing them until late winter and then shipping them to the large cities, principally Chicago, St. Louis, Kansas City and Minneapolis. A good profit has been considered a certainty and frequently high prices received in early spring have brought very large returns from a few acres. This fact has given some opportunity for speculation, with small chance for actual loss, and as a result the growers have planted large acreages year after year, often on the same soil,...
