Not illustrated. 1912 Excerpt: . . . is cut in two between the prothorax and mesothorax, both parts usually continued to feign death. The part posterior to the cut often remained in the death-feigning attitude for a considerable length of time after the operation. After the severed posterior portions come out of the inert condition, many cannot be induced to assume the usual death-feigning attitude; others will assume the deathfeigning position, and when the abdomen is stroked with a camels hair brush, the legs show evidence of a weak tetanic condition of but short duration which may in a very small per cent, of cases be maintained longer than one-half minute. It seems probable, that in some individuals at least, the shock effect may perhaps cause a renewed tetanic condition of the leg muscles, which condition may last for a considerable length of time after the cut was made. With the exception of the behavior shown immediately after...
