SECOND DAY In which Nanna relates to Pippa the nasty tricks that men play on poor females silly enough to believe them. Ippa. Let me recount my dream, and then I shall listen to you. Nanna. Recount it. Pippa. You will tell me its meaning? Nanna. I will. Pippa. This morning, at break of day methought I was in a high, spacious and very fine room adorned with red and yellow satin; over the arras there were hung up gilt swords, embroidered velvet hats, caps with medals, pictures and other fine things. A bed of shaggy brocade lay in one corner of the room; and I, as abbotly as an abbot, was enthroned in a crimson chair studded with gold bosses like that of the Pope. Around me were clustered bullocks, asses, sheep, buffaloes, foxes, peacocks, owls and blackbirds; it was useless for...
