Excerpt from The Latter-Day Saints Millennial Star, Vol. 97: September 26, 1935 In my first talk I suggested that there were certain kinds of truth and reality which could be reached, not by scientific methods, but only by a readiness to experience, a committing of our personality, a coming right off the fence once for all. That, it seems to me, and nothing less, is faith. It is not so much merely I believe as I trust. It is a quite definite psycho logical process which we all exercise more or less consciously in relation to more or less worthy objects every day. It is obviously different from and greater than mere credulity, and also distinct from passive suggestibility, chiey because it inevitably leads to action. Psychology is not directly concerned with the objects of faith, but it can say that the active and purposeful committal to some worthy ideal or purpose is a necessary factor for growth and development. Healthy religion quite agrees, saying that faith without works is dead. About the Publisher Forgotten Books publishes hundreds of thousands of rare and classic...
