The narrowness of the outer part of the furrow seen in figure 3 is evidently due to accidental pressure and is not found in other specimens. The nervous system is remarkably developed for a larva apparently not in special need of it, being devoid of both the power and opportunity for movement. The nervous system must here be just a morphological reminiscence. It is forming a conspicuous layer below the epidermis in the anterior end (plate xxvi, figure 6), reaching almost as far downwards as to the posterior end of the vestibular invagination. Ventrally it is more restricted and is seen only below the suckorial disk (plate xxv, figure 1); from here it branches (plate xxv, figure 2) and may then be followed for some distance downwards as a distinct nerve along each side of the vestibular invagination. The entoderm forms...
