There was a dance at the casino to-night, and the Winstanleys were going. As they were here they might as well profit by such amusements as were to be had; and though these balls at the casino were certainly quite unEnglish, still they amused the child, and that was everything. It was so natural that she should like to be amused, and that they, the staid elder sister and the indulgent mother, should like to see her pleased! So said Mrs. Winstanley to her compatriots when half-explaining half-excusing an action which really wanted neither explanation nor excuse. Had she been quite clear in her conscience--had she not been guilty of coquetting with chances in the person of Bois-Duval-- VOL. II. L she would not have made that little speech. It was a defence and a shield, a blind and a mask, and she thought herself...
