Excerpt from English Composition: 150 Specimens Arranged for Use in Psychological and Educational Experiments This Monograph consists of one hundred and fifty specimens of English composition whose general merit has been determined with fair precision by a consensus of from 23 to over 100 judges. Such a series will be useful for a number of purposes, especially for (a) tests of the accuracy of complex judgments, and consequent measurements of individual, class, and sex differences, correlations with other forms of judgment, and measurements of the effect of various conditions upon the accuracy of judgment; (b) experiments in practice and the transfer of improvement; (3) measurements of the ability of prospective teachers to distinguish merit in compositions; (d) the discovery of special prejudice and constant errors in the judgments made by teachers; (e) experiments to demonstrate and measure the value of objective scales as aids to the process of judging the general merit of specimens of English compositions.
