Not illustrated. 1904 Excerpt: . . . dealing with methods of measurement below, an indication of the way in which electrode potentials have been determined will be given; for the present we assume the results. The electrode potential then represents the work done in carrying unit quantity of electricity between electrode and electrolyte; and since on the ionic theory the carriage is effected by the formation or discharge of an ion, it is the work done in this chemical process that is involved. E. g. at the negative pole of the Daniell we have the reaction  $Zn \rightarrow Zn^{2+} + 2e^-$  Now it is found that about half a volt difference of potential exists in this case, the metal being negative to the solution. Again, at the other pole of the cell the reaction  $Cu^{2+} + 2e^- \rightarrow Cu$  involves a slightly greater potential difference (about 0.6 volt), but here the metal is positive to the...
