Excerpt: . . . far from his land and his own dear home to die. His own son, Prince Lou-is, was known to hate him and do all he could to vex him, and at last he fled from the court and made his home with an old foe of Charless, the Duke of Bur-gun-dy. The old king led a life of fear of this son. He would not eat or drink at last, for he thought Prince Lou-is would find means to kill him in his food. So at last he lost the strength and could not eat at all. No one felt much grief when he came to his death, for he had shown small love or thought for his realm. He had the name of Well-served, and to the great and good men who spent their lives to serve him should be all the fame of what France won in his reign. CHAPTER XI. LOU-IS XI. Lou-is The XL, son of Charles, was a man of craft and sense, but one of the worst men who has left his name on the list of kings. He had no care for aught but what would make him more strong and great, and no thought of the needs or griefs of those in his way. He did not care for pomp or state. He wore a mean and worn suit of clothes, and an old hat with small saints made of lead on the top of it....
