Excerpt: . . . not get damages, and yet they were in no way responsible for the accident, and deserved damages, in the eye of everybodys sense of justice, just as much as any body else. Several years ago, within half-a-dozen years, you will remember there was an appalling accident at Wollaston, in which a train of cars was wrecked in consequence of the negligence of a brakeman of a freight-train in not closing a switch upon the side-track. The passengers on board that train could get damages, but no man on the train, except he were a passenger, could get damages. The same principle is explained by further illustration. Here is a large manufactory, we will suppose the Pemberton Mills. Owing to the carelessness of somebody in the employ of the mill corporation, we will suppose, who constructed the building, it falls. Nobody can recover damages from...
