Having thus dealt with the general management of fowls, we will now give a little attention to the other domesticated birds which are cultivated side by side with them. Before doing so we should like to emphasize the importance of not attempting too much. Turkeys, and ducks, and geese, and guineafowl ought not to be kept mixed up with poultry. They must be kept apart, as one variety interferes with the others, and the old-fashioned plan of keeping two or three hundred birds of different kinds all mixed up together will have to...
