Brand New Book  Print on Demand .Excerpt from Clinical Excerpts, Vol. 20: April-May, 1914 The following practical values are attributed to the periodic classification: (1) To classify elements in natural groups. (2) To fix the atomic weights of elements whose equivalents are yet uncertain. (3) To predict the possible existence and properties of elements not yet discovered. (4) To correct errors in weights already assigned. Professor Park presented a separate table which he called the apocrypha, because it is not yet fully authenticated nor made canonical by chemists. It contained the names of a number of elements discovered recently, most of them among the so-called rare earths, including actinium, ionium, and polonium.
