Excerpt from The Declaration of Independence Its History This work is offered to the American people not only in the hope that it may be welcomed as a readable and reliable history of the Declaration of Independence but in the hope that it may in some degree tend to keep alive in their hearts the love of Liberty that possessed the Fathers. Benjamin Rush writes, to Rev. Mr. Gordon, at Roxbury, Mass., December 10, 1778: Rid Put us not off with Great Britains acknowledging our independence Alas! the great Ultimatum of our modern patriots. It is liberty alone that can make us happy. And without it the memorable 4th of July 1776 will be execrated by posterity as the day in which pandoras box was opened in this country. I am impatient to see your history. That there are numerous quotations between its covers is due to a belief of the author that the subject called less for his own views than for facts, and also to a belief that the very words afforded the most pleasing presentation. From some of those whose names have come down to us, numerous quotations have been made; from others, none at all. In this, there has been no intent to slight any particular person or Colony.
