In a certain proportion of cases, especially among children, the disease leads to obliteration, more or less complete, of the joint cavity, replacement of the tubercle tissue by new fibrous tissue, and bony or fibrous union between the bones. The joint then remains permanently stiff in a more or less favourable position. If only a part of the joint cavity be obliterated, spontaneous cure is possible with a limited range of motion; or in the most favourable cases the functions of the joint may be unimpaired. The chances of complete recovery are better among children than among adults. Persons with joint tuberculosis not infrequently develop consumption of the lungs. Acute general tuberculosis occurs occasionally as the result of an incomplete operation upon the diseased joint, or without apparent cause. The general treatment does not differ from that of tubercular processes elsewhere in the body. The local treatment consists first of measures T me t which serve to keep the inflamed joint quiet and to prevent, as far as possible, the crowding together of the diseased joint surfaces. These indications are best fulfilled by the application of some form of fixed apparatus, of which a very great variety are in use. Second, of operative measures the aim of which is to remove completely the diseased tissues or to correct deformities, or often of both objects combined. In children the treatment of tuberculosis of the joints by means of apparatus which keep the...
