Not illustrated. 1892 Excerpt: . . . These two were made of the same material and in the same manner as the artificial stones and were too frail to be used in the way Mr. Henshaw mentions in Perforated Stones from California, Bureau of Ethnology, 1887. A stone digging tool was found which was chisel-shaped at one end, was about sixteen inches long and about two inches in diameter. It must have been very useful in digging the Tule potato (Sagittaria) which is now sometimes called China potato, which grew and still grows in abundance along the sloughs and in the extensive tule marshes of the vicinity. The obsidian spear and arrow-heads found here were fine examples of aboriginal skill. Two obsidian crescent-shaped knives or implements, which had probably been used in dressing fish, had their convex edges squarely notched or blocked. They are or were on exhibition in the Smithsonian building in 1882, and differ from anything I have seen elsewhere. The burial ground appears to have once been the site of an Indian village, as bones of elk, deer, fish, ducks, geese, and other birds are plentiful. A circular, saucer-shaped excavation for a fandango or sweathouse, is additional evidence that a village once occupied the spot. Many of the skeletons which appear to have been buried last, and about the same time, were probably victims of small-pox or some other epidemic. Waves from passing steamboats have washed away a considerable part of the ground, and a large levee has...
