They are readily made; their results are easily remained; and so simple are the last in their nature, that it would have been thought childish to put them into words, had it not become necessary to embody them as the principles and groundwork of the mathematical sciences. The fact is that the terms observation and experiment are closely connected. The first is the faculty of the mind by which the second is experiments, whether they are derived by the senses alone, or by the assistance of the telescope or the thermometer. For Example, we learn to distinguish by the sight and touch that which we call a straight line. If any proof were necessary that our ideas on this subject are derived from observation alone, it would...
