Brand New Book  Print on Demand .Excerpt from The Foreign Quarterly Review, Vol. 9: January and May, 1832 Being introduced to some of the houses of the highest nobility on the footing of a companion. Such persons in that capacity were more useful before the introduction of bells than they have been since. She appears to have won her way by the agreeableness of her conversation, and the charm of her manners: and becoming the humble friend of Madame de Montespan, at that time the accredited mistress of the king, she was intrusted with the care and education of the royal bastards. The little Due de Maine was club-footed, and he and his governante were sent to all the baths in France and its neighbourhood, in the hopes of his wash ing his crooked foot straight. Previous to this time, the king had conceived a great aversion for Madame Scarron, and frs quentl attempted to induce Madame de Montespan to part with her. 2the perusal of her letters first produced a change in his feelings towards her. Afterwards she used to act as a mediator in the quarrels which frequently took place between the monarch and his haughty and capricious mistress, and was found so useful by both, that at last she became necessary. Madame de Mon tespan, the roudest beauty that ever graced or tormented ecourt, had at len the profound mortification of perceiving that she was indebted for the royal visits to the attendant governante, the poor and neglected widow of Scarron, the bufi oon-poet, whom she had raised from utter insi nificance to consequence and competency. When the Queen die the King made proposals to Madame de Maintenon (for that had become her name); she ventured...
