Excerpt from The Efficiency of Cooperative Livestock Shipping Associations in West Virginia Of cooperative shipping associations in West Virginia; to examine their efficiency as livestock marketing agencies; and to locate factors of inefficiency, the elimination of which would make such associations more effective agencies for marketing livestock, not alone in West Virginia, but also in states where similar conditions are found. Studies of cooperative livestock shipping associations have been made by experiment station workers in several states, chiefly where livestock is concentrated in large numbers. Many important principles have been established, some of which need modification for proper application under the conditions peculiar to West Virginia, a livestock deficit area. The conditions under which livestock is produced and marketed in West Virginia are quite similar to those found in a larger area of the Appalachian region. One outstanding difference between livestock production in this area and production in states where the most comprehensive studies of cooperative shipping associations have been made is that while livestock production is among the chief agricultural enterprises of West Virginia, the number produced per farm is comparatively small. It seemed worth while, therefore, to study the accomplishments of cooperative livestock shipping associations in an area where the number of animals per farm is small, where the volume of business for an association is necessarily limited, and where the marketing is highly seasonal.
