LOCALS: A COLLECTION OF PROSE POEMS

Serving House Books. Paperback. Condition: New. 86 pages. Dimensions: 8.0in. x 5.2in. x 0.2in. Locals is a narrative atlas of prose poems as intimate as they are unpredictable, each a keyhole glimpse into the life of a different realm where our normal logic doesn't apply. Are we beholding magic? No, but through observing these strangers, we're confronted by the extraordinary paradoxes within our own hearts. When Shakespeare wrote about the poets calling to give form to what imagination bodies forth, to local habitations, surely he was foreseeing the arrival of Claire Bateman's Locals. And if he was not as prescient as he now seems, then Claire Bateman has gloriously manifested his description of the poet's art in such a fabulous form that the Bard would be pleased. Renee Ashley Claire Bateman isn't just a terrific writer. Claire Bateman is a cosmos unto herself, one that's interlaced with our own, but clearly not our own. Oh, we have our representation here in the Bateman Cosmos--our joys and woes and fears and winged hopes are all on display. But doesn't the architecture smack of Escher? Don't the governing laws of the land evoke Borges? Didn't Russell Edson once serve as Exalted Poohbah? There's something... what is it? Freudian? Shamanic? Cubist... in the water. Enter the realm of the Bateman Cosmos, and you'll return to our own as a different person; or, even more intriguingly, you'll return as yourself, only more so. Albert Goldbarth? When you find yourself in the realms described by Claire Bateman's Locals, you'll probably spend your first few days trying to identify what it is about their culture that makes you uneasy. Is it the presence of licensed Misinterpreters and Coincidence Consultants? Is it that a reader's gaze absorbs the letters and illustrations in books? Is it that...
