Have you got any list of your customers V Certainly, said Mr. Rattary. Just look in that cracked teapot on the chimney, and you will find a bit of paper folded up, which contains the addresses of a few houses where I works. Just hand em down, and well look over em. Tom, with rather a puzzled air, took the packet out of the racked teapot, which consisted chiefly of tradesmens printed cards; some of them being the printed cards of the ostromers. others having the addresses of the cvr. . nmeis writta on their backs. See Notes and Narratives of a City Mission, p. 38. Scarcely a sweep known to me has escaped this dreadful disease. I remember but one who has not been operated on--some many times, and several have died. See also Appendix. Tom handed them very deferentially to Mr. Rattsw. Mr. Rattary handed them very df i;initially to Tom Tom turned them oyer; but, in doing so, he uuiiunately regarded some of them upside down, the fact being tluit neither Mr. Rattary nor Mr. Barman wero able to read a single word of letter or print. Aye, said Tom, going through this dumb show, that is very satisfactory. And, folding ihe cards up once more in the piece of paper, put them back on the mantel-shelf. Sir, I wish you good morning, said Tom, rising. Is there anything I can do out of doors...
