Chamber of Commerce, it is best to pursue the plan adopted in other parts of this report, of inquiring what are its weak points as it stands at present and how far the Council's action can strengthen them. (1.) Though examinations and syllabuses may stimulate and test teaching they cannot by themselves stand in lieu of it. Probably, considering the means at its disposal, the London Chamber of Commerce has acted in the only manner open to it in starting from the examination end. But the most crying evil is the want of teachers competent to give higher commercial instruction, and until we have them the results of a mere examination scheme will be somewhat disappointing. The Council would, therefore, do well to supplement the action of the Chamber of Commerce by supplying the teaching, whether by training teachers at home or on the...
