But those connected directly with the Admiralty have had more experience than any outsiders. In Parliament we have had the question discussed to a considerable extent, and one friend of mine has put it that the water-tube boiler is against the laws of nature. I do not think that marine engineers generally would be prepared to adopt that assertion, and I think it would be a dangerous thing if the Admiralty were to fall back from 80-knots destroyers to 2S knots, as suggested by Mr. Howden, for the sake of introducing the cylindrical boiler instead of the water-tube boiler. The water-tube boiler may have its defects yet, and to a certain extent, no doubt, it is in an experimental stage, but I, from the little experience that my firm have had, have great confidence that it is quite possible to produce a...
