Waterfowl production would increase on the margins of ponds and reservoirs presently in poor condition because of heavy livestock use. Generally, all wildlife associated with riparian and aquatic ecosystems would increase. Sensitive Species. More diverse vegetation and improved riparian habitat should increase bobcat prey numbers and hence bobcat populations. Mountain quail populations should respond favorably to the increased diversity of available insects and seeds. Grazing Systems Most wildlife habitat within the SVPA would improve with no grazing. Some dense stands of sagebrush would have increased forb production, but the productivity would only increase slightly. The total acres of wildlife habitat are presented in Appendix 6 (Table A6-1). Seasons of Use Cessation of late fall and winter grazing in deer and elk winter ranges would ensure the availability of maximum amounts of bitterbrush for big game. This could increase the number of deer and/or elk that a given winter range could support. Range Improvements There are no range improvements proposed in this alternative. Overly dense stands of sagebrush would still limit deer summer habitat and sage grouse brood habitat productivity in some areas. Consequences of the Lower Stocking Alternative Forage Allocation Big Game. More vegetation would be available to wildlife than under the proposed action. Consequently, the projected long-term numbers of big game would be achieved and probably exceeded. Numbers above the long-term projections would be limited more by...
