When the annual fires were stopped these roots sent up hundreds of shoots which grew rapidly and in the space of a few years produced a mass of scrubby brush that smothered out the grass completely. At first the brush was so thick it could not grow to any size. For many years it stood at about the height of a mans shoulder and from that height down. Gradually the more vigorous individuals got a little ahead and the weak ones died out. At the present time there are small areas scattered abundantly over the nearly level high silt or clay ridges of the Ozarks covered with a thick growth of young Post Oak or Black Jack trees from 2 to six inches in diameter that have grown from such brush patches. All these ridges are now covered with such a growth where they are not in cultivation. The result is that the grass has been completely killed out. In many parts of the region there is abundant vacant land to furnish range for more stock than the country now has but it is covered with young trees rather than grass. In the hilly, stony belts of country between the smooth clay ridges or the original slightly stony ridges and prairies, the same process has gone on at least so far as the result is concerned. The growth of timber has completely killed out the grass in some places and greatly injured it everywhere. It has...
