Excerpt: . . . performed the few domestic duties necessary in their little home--washed, mended, and cooked; and when these offices were over, it was generally time to go to Mr. Ensdel's studio; and when she returned, had given her mother her tea, and heard her complaints of the neighbours insolence, and the heartless manner in which they neglected her, it was time to go to Mr. Twiss, and reap what benefit she could from his instructions. Mr. Twiss did not give himself very much trouble about her. He sat and smoked his pipe, and, if funds were plentiful, sipped his gin and water, while Meg spelled out her lesson, and then repeated it to him. He sat by her side while she wrote, and lazily directed her in the formation of her letters. Then she read aloud to him, and the reading was very wearying. The little easy...
